I am lucky to have the regular opportunity of being the lecturer for the SARCH training course at CTT. And it really is an opportunity. Meeting a lot of new (potential) system architects, discussing a lot of different experiences, and discovering the ins and outs of all kinds of cultures.

The SARCH training course is always visited by people from various Philips Product Divisions and Business Lines. And sometimes even from non-Philips companies. In addition to information from theory using lectures, the SARCH training course contains a lot of group exercises and discussions. To me, these parts are the enormous added value of attending this 5-day training course.

And I am happy to see that SARCH is again gaining in popularity. A couple of weeks ago, I gave the SARCH training course for the fourth time this year. I will especially never forget an in-house version for a team of 8 architects at the start of this year in the beautiful Alps in France. It was intense and to the point. The lunches were great with nice red wine and I discovered some very good pistes! And again, I am happy to experience that Gerrit Muller's formula - as the father of this training course - keeps on working remarkably well!
